Wesselton Mine, Kimberley This picture is interesting, as it shows one of the very few open mines now being worked. Both night and day the search goes on, and every twelve hours blasting operations take place to induce the solid rock to yield up its treasures. At a quarter-past twelve a warning whistle is blown, and shortly after the deadly stillness is broken by a deafening cannonade, and flying débris and clouds of white smoke rise all round the mine, marking the places where the dynamite has done its work.
